It's time to invest on sponsored content

By Laurence Lukhele
11 February 2020

We all know that at times its hard to find your target audience. Capturing their attention can be even harder. Investing in sponsored content helps marketers do both. Sponsored content is a form of content marketing that is typically created by the publisher that distributes it. It is also called native advertising, because it looks and feels like other, native content on the site.

History of Valentine's Day

By Laurence Lukhele
7 February 2020

We had different stories about Valentine's and what people believe is what they enjoy reading. At the end of the day we all interested to make our own stories seen. Roses, chocolates, and beautiful heart-shaped doilies are usually the images that come to mind when we think of Valentine's Day. Red hearts and heartfelt cards decorate every store, and all your coupled-up friends have a little spring in their step as other websites say.

Small Business Tax Mistakes

By Laurence Lukhele
29 January 2020

Filing a tax return for your business each year is something you must do. But you don't want to make mistakes that can result in higher taxes than you really owe, draw ERA attention to your return, or cost you interest and penalties. Here are few mistakes to avoid in 2020. 1. Misreporting Income Income may be reported to you (and to the ERA) on information returns, if you're an independent contractor showing credit card and certain other transactions, regardless of your entity type (e.g.

Recruitment experts give their verdict on creative resumes

By Laurence Lukhele
20 January 2020

In today's competitive job market — where hiring managers can spend as little as seven seconds looking at a resume — jobseekers may be tempted to add a little creative flair to their applications to help them stand out from the pack. According to the Wall Street Journal, this has led to a new phenomenon — resumes are beginning to resemble social media profiles, with emojis, headshots and even bitmojis making an appearance.
